Somewhere along the line, "agricultural history" and "personal history" became words that would never be used to describe the same thing again. Let's look at it: In the past, people looked after their farms, their livestock and their families, and stayed at home. Then the Industrial Revolution happened. Farms are used to raise livestock, which require feed, and when you grow animals, you need soil and vegetation. So if you want to make money, you have to grow food, and you have to transport it. It's efficient to have big and often mechanised farms, because they are used to provide the stuff that you eat, and transport means you have to buy it. So, as a farmer, you can either grow your own food and live in the village, or you can trade in the village. In the modern world, the farming industry has become a high-value service industry. To be a good farmer, you don't just need to be a good farmer; you also need to be a good marketer. Farms produce more than just food, because they raise livestock and other goods, which give money to the farmer. There are a lot of different ways that a farmer can earn money: It could be by selling their own goods, which they can do at the local market in the village Or they could have contracts with other farmers to help them in exchange for money Then there's farming-as 82157476af
